Hundreds of thousands of men and women in America are totally destitute and not able to earn enough to afford food, clothes and shelter. Every night they sleep outside on the street, under bridges, in bushes all across the greatest, mightiest and wealthiest nation on earth. Yet, there is a general apathy for their plight because most people it seems cannot relate to what it is like to be homeless. The author is telling his story and portraying the reality of homelessness from his experience in order to create consciousness about this social plague. His message is simple: Homelessness is dehumanizing and detrimental to the individual and a problem of epidemic proportion that should alarm society as a whole, in America in particular. And those who think they are immune to it may be mistaken. Therefore, there must be an urgency from individuals and society to act to solve and end homelessness so that human dignity can be restored in the lives of so many human beings who have no home and live outside like animals.
